WHITNEY MEMBERS DON'T MISS IT

Hopper Drawing
Through October 6, 2013

This summer the Whitney presents Hopper Drawing. In his iconic works, Edward Hopper (1882–1967) wove together details carefully transcribed from observed reality into complex, haunting images indelibly marked by his imagination. The artist's sketches, notebooks, and drawings preserve a record of the painstaking development of his iconic paintings. Hopper's relationship with the Whitney began even before the founding of the Museum, when his first solo exhibition was held at the Whitney Studio Club in 1920. In 1967, mindful of this long relationship, Josephine Hopper made a bequest to the Whitney of her late husband's artistic estate, which included more than 2,500 drawings. Rarely exhibited during the artist's lifetime, these works are now an unparalleled resource for understanding his creative process.

Hopper Drawing surveys the artist's practice as a draftsman and then explores his creative approach in a series of thematic galleries. Some galleries trace the treatment of a theme, like the bedroom or the road, over the course of Hopper's career. Other rooms display comprehensive suites of preparatory studies and sketches alongside finished paintings to elucidate the genesis of specific, beloved works, including New York Movie (1939), Office at Night (1940), and Nighthawks (1942).

JUNE/JULY 2013 ALSO ON VIEW

Robert Irwin: Scrim veil—Black rectangle—Natural light, Whitney Museum of American Art, New York (1977)
Opens June 27, 2013

This site-specific work, which has not been exhibited since the 1977 Robert Irwin retrospective at the Whitney, uniquely engages the Museum's fourth floor gallery. Like many of Irwin's installation projects, the work manipulates light and space to subtly alter a familiar space, intensifying the viewer's awareness of the process of perception.

I, YOU, WE
Through September 1, 2013

The three simple pronouns "I," "you," "we"—with all their implied complexities of meaning—provide an unexpected guide for assessing works of art in the Whitney's collection made in the 1980s and early 1990s. This selection of paintings, sculpture, drawings, prints, and photographs brings into focus the personal, social, and collective issues that concerned artists during that time, issues that still resonate today.

David Hockney: The Jugglers
Through September 1, 2013

In his first video installation, The Jugglers, June 24th 2012 (2012), David Hockney engages viewers with a composite image displayed as a multiscreen tableau. The piece continues his ongoing exploration of how technologies can open up new ways of making, and looking at, images.

American Legends: From Calder to O'Keeffe
On continuous view

In a rotating series of room-size installations of work by one or two artists, this permanent collection presentation showcases the Whitney's deep holdings of artwork from the first half of the twentieth century by eighteen leading artists.

T. J. Wilcox: In the Air
Opens September 19, 2013

Robert Indiana: Beyond LOVE
Opens September 26, 2013

SUMMER MUSEUM GUIDE

2013

LOWER GALLERY

In Parts
Opens June 13, 2013
Robert J. Hurst Family Gallery

Artists frequently think beyond the unique object, choosing to work with a group of closely related images that together express an artistic vision in its entirety. This ongoing installation, drawn from the Museum's extensive holding of works on paper, presents examples of this creative process. Works by Dotty Attie, Mark Bradford, Carroll Dunham, Dan Flavin, Jasper Johns, Elizabeth Murray, Lorna Simpson, Joyce Trieman, and Terry Winters, among other artists, will be shown in rotation.

The Future Whitney

The Whitney is constructing a new home in downtown Manhattan, which will open to the public in 2015. Situated on Gansevoort Street between the High Line and the Hudson River, the new building will vastly increase the Whitney's exhibition and programming space, providing the first comprehensive view of its extraordinary collection of American art. For more information, see the display in the Lower Gallery or visit whitney.org/Future.

FIRST FLOOR

Stewart Uoo and Jana Euler: Outside Inside Sensibility
Through August 11, 2013
Anne & Joel Ehrenkranz Gallery

Stewart Uoo and Jana Euler are emblematic of an emerging group of artists whose work interrogates how the social, technological, and cultural forces at work today shape the contemporary "self." In this exhibition, Uoo's dystopic cyborg-mannequins are juxtaposed with Euler's multilayered figurative painting within an environment design by Uoo. Seen together, the works suggest new ways of thinking about contemporary portraiture.

SECOND FLOOR

I, YOU, WE
Through September 1, 2013
Mildred & Herbert Lee Galleries

"I," "you," "we": three very commonplace words. These pronouns—with all their implied complexities of meaning—provide an unexpected guide for assessing the works of art from the 1980s and early 1990s in the Museum's collection. What becomes apparent in this survey of paintings, sculpture, drawings, prints, and photographs is how the personal, social, and collective issues and concerns of the artists of this time are still relevant several decades later.

David Hockney: The Jugglers
May 23–September 1, 2013
Kaufman Astoria Studios Film & Video Gallery

This exhibition marks the U.S. premiere of David Hockney's video installation The Jugglers, June 24th 2012 (2012). Filmed by eighteen cameras, a group of jugglers make up a vibrantly kinetic composition as they move across a grid of eighteen screens, accompanied by a lively musical soundtrack. The multiple perspectives offer the choice of where to look to the viewer, demonstrating the artist's exploration of technology's ability to open up new ways of looking at, and making, images.

THIRD FLOOR

Hopper Drawing
May 23–October 6, 2013
Peter Norton Family Galleries

Hopper Drawing is the first major exhibition to survey the drawings and working process of Edward Hopper (1882–1967), pairing many of his iconic oil paintings, including New York Movie (1939) and Nighthawks (1942), with their preparatory studies and related works. Hopper's drawings reveal the continually evolving relationship between observation and invention in the artist's work, and his abiding interest in motifs—New York's urban fabric, the movie theater, the bedroom, the road—to which he would return throughout his career.
